Gov Cleveland's 'Private Character'

In Democratic party in its unwholesome effort to make political capital out of the private life of a candidate who, by his own record of public service, has invited no offensive criticism of his personal character, has given him the benefit of the fullest support in holding him to the high standard he has always represented. The first cry was that there was a conspiracy to defeat the Democratic party by charging him with gross immorality, and he was begged to take definite steps to publicly refute the publication of the Buffalo Telegraph, which shocked the moral sentiment of the country. The facts of the Buffalo Telegraph story were then shown to be false in every particular, and the public was assured that Mr. Cleveland had never been married to any woman but the mother of his children, and that she was living with her husband, surrounded by his affectionate care, and in the enjoyment of the highest social consideration. Then the Democratic party was asked to rally to the support of Mr. Cleveland because the charges against him were false and malicious, and because the people would not endure the persecution of a man who had been so foully slandered. Then it was discovered that the charges were true, and the Democratic party was asked to rally to the support of Mr. Cleveland because, although the charges were true, they were not known to be true when the party nominated him

Fashions.

(New York Evening Post.)

Velvet ribbon is lavishly used as a garniture both for hats and dresses.

In Paris, in the matter of head-coverings there is a struggle between the charming French cap, or man's cap, the classic, directoire, and the round hat with waving plumes, commonly them called "entonnoir de premiere classe."

Many of the little coquine, cloth bonnets, and felt hats from abroad have a simple yet artistic trimming formed entirely of soft kerchiefs twisted and arranged around the crowns only. A French manipulator can twist, with the unattainable Parisian charm thrown in. Many of these dainty affairs are made wholly of brocaded kerchiefs in brilliant colorings, and the "unmatchable" bonnet in lustrous demand, these glaring scarlet and brightening effect to the sallow hands, costumes of rich, dark-toned cloth so universally worn.

Polonaises and redingotes of fawn-colored or Quaker gray nuns' cloth, figured with raised dots or tufts of chenille or silk, in colors of rich crimson, moss green, or royal blue, make very stylish and effective costumes over plain or kilted skirts the co-lumns over plain or kilted skirts the co-lumns matching exactly the shade of velveteen, matching exactly the shade of the silk or chenille figure in the cloth overdress.

A handsome and elaborate bonnet, from the house of Grange & Magentles, is composed of pink foulard shot with gold, and brocaded with clusters of dark red and orange wall flowers. The front of the dress is made of plain pink foulard finished with ruffles of dark red spanish lace, with the designs outlined with gold thread. The half-long sleeves are trimmed, and the deep fichu collar is made of dark red velvet, lined with gold-colored foulard.

Very small wreaths of flowers are again worn in the hair, or one large blossom, which is always placed at the left side behind the ear. Greek fillets are much worn in Paris by those who affect the toilet of a Grecque, but ladies who adopt this antique fashion in the coiffure occasionally forget that this style presupposes a very luxurious and abundant head of hair, the effect of the fillets being to restrain its exuberance.

Bluish and velvet flowers are very rich and elegant this season, forming the petals of large shaded petals, nasturtiums, dahlias, and other fashionable flowers and leaves, clusters of agnatin foliage in velvet are arranged in sets for the bonnet and mull decorations to be worn later on, and one dainty in floral garniture is a group of velvet ferns and mosses in green and gray colorings, with a brilliant tropical bird perched in the cluster.

Wide striped satins in colors of pale blue, pink mauve, or sea green, alternating with those of gold or silver, brocaded with small garlands or clusters of flowers, are favorite materials for evening toilets for very young ladies. These dresses are made without the admixture of any other fabric, with plain full skirts, but draped over the hips and in the back. The sleeves are half long and the pointed corsage is cut out very much both front and back, and filled in with a satin gulmpe of one plain color matching exactly in shade one of the colors of the stripe. Instead of the satin, however, a cream-white lace chemisette rose is often substituted.

Some of the new French polonaises of frise velvet are shaped in front to form a waistcoat. The sides lengthen into long panels reaching almost to the foot of the dress skirt. The rich garniture used border the side panels, and are carried up each side of the bodice portion, forming the waistcoat. On the richer models elaborate embroidery in silk nearly covers the panels, others are thickly tufted with dots in raised chenille work, and bordered with a deep chenille fringe.

Many of the fashionable millinery stores in the city are making a display of trim little jockey-capped bonnets, toques, bebe and gypsy bonnets, covered with velvet, plush or soft material. These are ready for trimming and are most ingenious contrivances, the shape being so various that almost any person can suit her taste of color and style to suit her. The price of these specialties is not high; one can easily afford a shape to match each costume, and for hard wear and general service they are certainly superior to anything of the kind ever offered at the price. They are also a very appropriate accompaniment to the basque jacket, and should in such its color.

Yellow and white is a very favorite combination in Parisian evening toilets just at present. One costly and exquisite dress shows a skirt of white lace with panels of white brocaded satin, worn under a very tight-fitting trained princesse dress of pale yellow plush which opens in front from the waist downwards so as to show the white of the lace petticoat. The edges of this plush are turned back with handsome Spanish blonde, and at the point where the basque ceases on either side, a long slender spray of hazel nuts and leaves—the latter in pale yellow tints—hang in graceful pendants. The bodice is made high with a Medici collar the sides of which roll back in front. This collar is made of plush, and is lined inside with a fretted of blond, with garniture at one side of bows, nuts and leaves. A spray of the same is to be worn in the hair, and a large oval fan of yellow satin is hand-painted with nuts and leaves.

Very handsome toilets for evening wear are made with skirt of corded silk and entrasse corsage of velvet of a deeper shade to match. This corsage, fits the closely eg, a jersey, and the sleeves are either short or elbow length. The panier tunic below is made of the silk fabric. For a matron, a black velvet bodice richly embroidered or beaded, with skirt and tunic of black satin trimmed to correspond, is very handsome, and so also is one of dark royal blue in the same style with velvet trimmings on the skirt. A lovely dress for a young girl is made of pale peach-blossom pink-grounded. Watteau pleat, figured with pale blue forget-me-nots in raised velvet. The brocade forms the Louis XIV. tunic, and the plain gored skirt and the close bodice is of pale blue velvet. A tiny ruffle of the velvet shows from beneath the skirt around the foot.

A very stylish Parisian dinner dress for a young lady is made of claret-colored Ottoman silk of magnificent quality. The round waist is cut in simple blouse fashion, though fitting the form very closely under the arms. Two single box pleats are laid over the waist front and back, and between these is a fan pleating of claret-colored velvet, covering the centre portion of the bodice in the back, and forming a gilet in front. Over the wide box pleats are placed broad bands in appliqué of dark ruby beads in a heavy floral design; the short underskirt has three kilt-pleated ruffles of the silk bordered with claret velvet gored on the left side of the skirt, with an apron panel which covers half the front and all of the right side of the skirt, bordered with the bead bands in appliqué. Over the hips are full-rounded panniers likewise finished. The Ottoman drapery in the back is exceedingly bouffant, and around the waist is a straight ceinture of ruby bead-work, to which is attached a moschoir pouch of claret velvet covered with an embroidery of ruby beads.

The superb opera cloaks which gained such dazzling repute last winter will be even surpassed in richness and elegance the coming season. All the newly imported evening cloaks are marked by a magnificent combination of colorings, many of the most expensive models being decidedly Eastern in design and finish. Pale tinted brocaded velvets are also a favorite in the formation of costly wraps. A very beautiful cloak received from Worth is made of ivory white Sicilienne. It is in a long pelisse shape, laid in narrow pleats down the centre of the back, lined with pink satin, and bordered with with marabout feather trimmings. Another more showy one is of mauve satin shot with gold, lined with gold satin, and trimmed with gold lace and satin ribbons. A third is of pale blue and silver brocade, lined with cream-white satin, and trimmed on its edges with a rich passementerie fringe of pearls and crystals intermixed with cascades of cream-white lace.

Last winter the skirts to street dresses were much more tastefully trimmed, except, perhaps, the tailor-made costumes, than they will be for the coming season. Now simple braids in rows, velvet ribbon trimmings laid on flat, and tacks in various widths and the choice. The skirt is as plainly and simplicity about such forms of trimming that the coldest winds approach, and not likely, to be affected by weather influences, as what every woman of sense and taste desires will be with to be plainness of comfort and warmth, substantial clothing, well-cut and stylishly made, and but little trimmed
